DEFENCE

■ Royal Marines sent in to do America's dirty work

As 1,700 British troops, spearheaded by 700 Royal Marine commandos began to fly into Bagram air base, north of Kabul, Geoff Hoon, the defence secretary, warned that he was prepared to deploy even more British troops in Afghanistan and that their mission may keep them there much longer than the government had so far admitted. The government of Blair which lies firmly in line with Bush administration policy in the area would, Hoon told Jonathon Dimbleby on ITV, keep British troops in the area 'for as long as their military leaders judge they can do an effective job.' This is an interesting statement because British troops will be under the overall command of the US army's Major-General Gary Hagenbeck. And it was actually US commanders who requested the British marines in the first place after Operation Anaconda - where US troops fought al-Qaida fighters in mountains south of Gardez - exposed a better equipped and more resourceful enemy than first thought. All this in spite of a leaked, highly classified report sent to Tony Blair by the chief of the defence staff, Admiral Sir Michael Boyce, warning him to expect serious casualties and deaths over the coming weeks among the British commandos.

LAW AND ORDER

■ Drug cartels target Wales

Yardie drug traffickers seeking fresh markets for heroin and cocaine are on the verge of a turf war in south Wales, the local Chief Constable has warned. Sir Anthony Burden, who is in charge of the south Wales force, pointed to strong evidence showing that Yardie drug dealers from Jamaica have been pushing into the area believing it to be ripe territory. He said that police in Bristol "saw a complete change in the complexion of their city in just two weeks" when such gangs targeted it. Sir Anthony's fear that Wales has been targeted by criminal cartels has been borne out by recent crime figures which show a surge in the number of heroin seizures and an alarming rise in class A drug related deaths. In the 10 months to February heroin seizures in south Wales rose by 84% and arrests for supply rose by 83%. Rivalry has driven down prices to such a degree that south Wales now has the cheapest heroin and cocaine in Britain. Sir Anthony said the next step in the cycle would be drive-by shootings and an increase in gun related crime as gangs squared up to each other. He added: "The New York of old will be the streets of south Wales if we don't wake up to the growing menace of heroin and cocaine use in our communities."

POLITICS

■ Union leader attacks 'vain dictator' Blair

As the Labour Party continues to implode, Tony Blair has been labelled a 'vain dictator' by a leading union leader. On the eve of his retirement as general secretary of the National Association of Schoolmasters Union of Women Teachers, Nigel de Gruchy accused Blair and other "ambitious, self-seeking, self opinionated" politicians of having done more damage to children's education in this country than anything else over the last 30 years, and of having caused political apathy and low voter turn out at elections. On the subject of teaching citizenship in the classroom, Mr. de Gruchy declared: "I say to Mr Blair, restore democracy to your party, restore it to Parliament, restore it even to the Cabinet and then citizenship might be worth teaching."

IMMIGRATION

■ Taxpayers to pay for asylum arson

The people of Bedfordshire are being threatened with a insurance bill of £97 million after rioting asylum seekers destroyed and burned Yarls Wood asylum removal centre back in February. A Lloyd's of London insurance syndicate, acting for Group 4 security company, has lodged the claim, double the sum that it said it would be seeking, with the Bedfordshire Police Authority. It refers to the Riot Damages Act, 1886, which allows the police to be sued for compensation if they fail to prevent "riotous or tumultuous" behaviour. Up to 25 asylum-seekers are still at large. The remaining 84 asylum-seekers in the centre have been transferred to other accommodation because adequate insurance cover could not be found. If group 4 win, it will cost every resident of Bedfordshire £500.

Democracy is more important than multiculturalism

"It's incredible. Almost everyone I know, or speak to, in Burnley, say they're voting BNP." This shocked comment from Audrey Pike, the sister of the sitting Labour MP for the town, sums it all up: The British National Party is heading for the breakthrough! May 2nd will see the largest number of BNP candidates ever to have stood in local elections.

The numbers involved will still be far fewer than stood as British nationalists back in the 1970s, but there's another crucial difference too - this time, there's a serious chance of some of those candidates winning. The opposition know this and are pulling out all the stops to prevent the BNP breakthrough.

Top Labour politicians have been out in force, threatening massive job losses and riots in any town which backs the BNP; Marxist trades union leaders have wasted thousands of pounds of their members' dues on full page newspaper adverts and glossy smear leaflets; while many 'beat' bobbies have expressed their support for the BNP, some of their superiors have been ordering them to harass our organisers.

Meanwhile, far-left fanatics have tried to intimidate members of the public who sign our nomination papers; TV companies have run a series of dramas showing 'evil racists' causing trouble, and various local and national newspapers have added their weight to the campaign to deny the British people a democratic choice.

Finally we've had to put up with a low level but continual campaign of sniping and obstruction by various people who, although nominally 'good nationalists', have a vested interest in seeing the BNP and its present leadership fail, and have done everything in their fortunately limited ability to make that happen. To paraphrase Winston Churchill, never in the field of nationalist politics have so many worked so hard to block the progress of so few!

Professional campaigns

Whether this unholy alliance actually succeeds in blocking us, however, remains to be seen. Against their efforts, we in turn are pitching the most in-depth and professional local election campaigns ever in the history of British nationalism. Whose campaign will bear fruit? We'll know by about midnight on May 2nd, especially if our precautions against electoral fraud pay off. New Labour strategists, council leaders or police chiefs may well think that the need to "preserve harmony" justifies the use of fraud to rob white communities in places like Bradford, Oldham and Burnley of their democratic right to elect British National Party councillors to speak for them. But they would be sorely mistaken if they do go down that road and put multiculturalism before democracy.

"Any popular suspicion that the white working class and the BNP have been undemocratically robbed of electoral representation would pour high-octane fuel on the dangerous communal tensions which are spreading and deepening as the multi-racial 'experiment' comes to its inevitable failed end."

Any popular suspicion that the white working class and the BNP have been undemocratically robbed of electoral representation would pour high-octane fuel on the dangerous communal tensions which are spreading and deepening as the multi-racial 'experiment' comes to its inevitable failed end.

Undemocratic assaults

We urge the Powers That Be, including the media, to draw back from their fundamentally undemocratic assaults on a legal and peaceful British National Party election campaign. Apart from anything else, it's futile. Whether we win this May or not, public resentment against the entire New Labour project, coupled with the increasing sophistication of the BNP's election-fighting machine, mean that it's now only a matter of time before we do start taking council seats. The sooner our opponents get used to the idea the better.

The thing about democracy is that you have to accept that sometimes people win whose ideas you disagree with. The British National Party accepts that fundamental rule of the game. And we believe that democracy is more important than multiculturalism. The question is, do Tony Blair and David Blunkett?

ISLAM, ZIONISM AND T

Back in the Cold War, at a time when even quite a few Conservative MPs openly opposed immigration, the race question couldn't automatically be used to sort out the genuine nationalist men from the Tory boys. Among radical nationalists, therefore, the ideological divide which separated us from conservatives was marked primarily by attitudes to capitalism. Reactionaries supported it. We opposed it, regarding its tendency to growing concentrate ever more wealth in the hands of fewer and fewer people as socially and politically dangerous and fundamentally against the nationalist principle of well-distributed private property.

experience of the true nature of these proposed new 'friends.'

In addition, some of them are also guilty of allowing their decision on where to stand vis-à-vis this reborn threat to the West to be influenced by the short-term exigencies of their own factional interests.

Self-serving deceit

With suspicion of, and opposition to, Zionism being so deeply embedded among long-standing nationalists, it's irresistibly easy for some of these big fish in small puddles to attempt to discredit more successful and mainstream organisations like the BNP by alleging or speculating that our stance against the Islamification of the West is the result of our being in thrall to - or at least 'soft' on - Zionism and its American capitalist client/sponsor.

The pro-capitalists claimed this made us pro-Communist, we pointed out that it did not, and that we opposed Communism as well. "Neither Red Front nor Reaction," ran one old slogan which summed it all up. Then, as a degree of intellectual sophistication crept in, a newer phrase was coined to sum up the stance of genuine nationalists all over Europe: "Neither Capitalism nor Communism but the Third Position."

Communist collapse

With the fall of the Berlin Wall and the collapse of the Soviet Union, however, and as the Red students of 1968 started to move into well-paid management positions, they abandoned their theoretical opposition to capitalism and regrouped on the cultural issues now commonly described as 'Political Correctness.' With the once-mighty Red Army reduced to stealing cabbages and swapping Kalashnikovs for bottles of vodka, the idea that Communism was a serious military or economic threat faded away. But Nature abhors a vacuum and - contrary to the wishful thinking of liberal scribblers - History never ends. September 11th brought home to millions what some European nationalist intellectuals, such as Guillaume Faye, had already perceived. Communism was dead as an organised force, multinational capitalism continued to remain a threat to cultural, national and ethnic particularities; but the defenders of the West have a new enemy to worry about as well: Militant Islam.

European alternative

Strangely, however, some of the 'hardline' nationalists who had been most strongly in favour of opposing both capitalism and communism with a third, genuinely European, alternative, have lacked the intellectual rigour to analyse and adapt to this new challenge. Their attitude, instead, is based on the old theory that "my enemy's enemy is my friend." And since capitalism, particularly at the point at which it intersects with Zionism, is the surviving old enemy, Muslim regimes and militants are perceived as potential 'friends.' Interestingly enough, none of the followers of this essentially reactionary theory actually live or campaign among the white working class communities which have first hand

September 11th brought home the fact that the defenders of the West have a new enemy to worry about: Militant Islam.

THE WESTERN HERITAGE

Such accusations are identical in their intellectual sloppiness or self-serving deceit to those made by Cold War era conservatives against genuine nationalists when they alleged that our opposition to capitalism meant that we were in some way sympathetic to Communism. Coming from the likes of Reader's Digest, this sort of specious 'logic' is to be expected, but when it comes from individuals who have been involved in our Cause for decades, one is entitled to smell a rat.

It is simply not on to point out that many of the Islamic criticisms of the West - as ruled by the likes of Bush, Blair and the people who pull their strings - are valid. Of course they are: September 11th, for example, clearly was largely the result of 'American' subservience to the Israeli lobby, and consequent evils such as the martyrdom of the Palestinians, the genocidal blockade of Iraq, and the US military occupation of Islam's holiest territory in Saudi Arabia.

Deification of profit

But much the same could have been said about the Communist critique of capitalism. Capitalism does indeed involve the exploitation of the many by the few; it does lead to the deification of Profit, regardless of the expense in terms of shattered lives and communities; it does lead to the alienation of the individual and the destruction of traditional cultures and fragile environments. As capitalism enters its final, totally globalised phase, it even begins to look as though Karl Marx's prophesy about the proletarianisation and subsequent unbearable exploitation of virtually the entire workforce may not have been that wide of the mark. It certainly looks that way for the millions of Western industrial workers now being squeezed into low-paid service jobs by competition from billions of Chinese.

There is indeed a great deal of truth in the communist description of what is wrong with capitalism. The problem with Communism, however, is that its prescription by way of 'cure' is even worse than the disease itself. Precisely the same is true of the Islamicist response to the nation-devouring arrogance of the so-called 'New World Order.'

Islam and Communism

As a matter of fact, there are extraordinarily close parallels between Islam and Communism, particularly as revised after their founders' deaths by the Wahhabis and Lenin. Fundamentalist Islam and Marxist-Leninism are not, as their adherents claim, respectively a religion and a scientific analysis of world history. In reality, they are both nothing more or less than tools for the attainment of power in the here-and-now. They are about neutralising and destroying their opponents and turning their adherents from being hate-filled outsiders to masters of all they survey.

Both have the same origins in the Messianic undercurrent of the Semitic world. Both, despite their claims to the contrary, are totally unscientific - one, for example, tells its followers that the stars are lamps in the sky, the other that all men are equal. Both are completely at odds with the Western, Faustian spirit, the thing that makes the question 'Why?' the foundation stone of our civilisation. Both are incapable of seeing "the other man's position," save that he is a heretic and should be tortured into mending his ways or executed 'for the good of society.'

We reject both pro-Zionist internationalism - particularly where it threatens to drag us into other peoples' wars - and the Islamification of our homelands.

Internationalist

Both are entirely internationalist in outlook, and hence fundamentally anti-nationalist and against the survival of the separate cultures and races of mankind. Both are inherently dogmatic, claiming the right to control the bodies, hearts and minds of everyone who falls under their sway. Neither recognises or accepts any checks or balances, no idea that some things may belong to Caesar and others to God. Both are intolerant to a degree unbearable to the Western soul, every bit as totalitarian as the capitalist dogma that claims that Profit and the markets are the highest - nay, the only - good.

Both, when it comes to conversion, appeal to the criminal and the misfit, to those who are unable or unwilling to face up to the real world. A generation ago, both shoe-bomber Richard Read and Frank Dobson's chinless wonder of a spoilt son would have been railing against the West as members of the International Marxist Group.

Now, however, they and thousands like them find their refuge from reality and consolation for their own insecurities in Islam.

An ally?

Truly, Western nationalists can no more make common cause with the adherents of this utterly alien philosophy than we could with the Communists.

If the Islamicists were only concerned about what is happening in their own part of the world, it would be a different matter (although even that position needs some qualification and perhaps an explanation from those 'hardline' white nationalist 'anti-Semites' who want to see Hamas totally destroy the state of Israel. What happens then? What if the survivors all want to come and live in Bournemouth? A two-state solution, as supported by the BNP in its analysis of the problems underlying Sept 11th, would of course be unjust on the Palestinians, but it's hardly a 'sell-out' of the interests of the nations of the West).

But, of course, radical Islam is not just interested in its own part of the world, in just what goes on between Morocco and Pakistan. Islam simply doesn't recognise that there is part of the world which is its rightful sphere of influence, and parts where it has no business. It is at its very roots a restless, expansionist, intolerant creed. The words of the old communist song mocking socialist appeals for 'moderation' are just as applicable to Islam: "Be moderate!" The timorous cry. This causes us great mirth. For our demands most moderate are: We only want the Earth!"

The nature of Islam

That's the key to understanding Islam, and all its followers, from Osama Bin Laden, through the Saudi Sheikhs who financed him, to the fifteen-year-old who worships in the mosque the same people paid for in a town near you: They don't just want their patch, they want the whole lot. They believe that's the will of Allah, so, in everything they do to hasten the day when Islam rules from Pole to Pole, they're only obeying orders!

Anyone who claims that 'ordinary' Muslims living in Britain are no more of a threat to our way of life than Hindus or (most bizarrely of all) Catholics, has - either through ignorance or wilful blindness - totally missed the point. Hindus, while we would far rather they weren't in our country at all, have never wanted to convert us all to Hinduism, and most Catholics no longer want to have us all saying 'Hail Marys' either. And, as a matter of fact, even if they did, we would only be going back to where we were 500 years ago. We'd probably see an end to genetic engineering and plans for space exploration, but at least we'd remain white. Under Islam, by contrast, you could kiss the lot goodbye.

Acknowledging reality

To point out such facts is not to "declare war on Islam," but merely to acknowledge reality. The presence of a large number of Muslims in our midst is totally incompatible with white survival, modern science, Western democracy and our entire Europeanised-Christian heritage. That doesn't mean that we have any problem with Islam dominating the Middle East and parts of Asia, in fact, it's probably in our interests that it does so. Provided we kept out its refugees, a Pakistan - for example - dominated forever by the Taliban would be less of a threat to us than one under the rule of a technologically capable military dictatorship. For one thing, its population explosion would rapidly go into sharp reverse.

It is of no concern whatsoever to us whether Saudi Arabia bans its women from driving, cuts off the hands of thieves, or forbids or allows European guest-workers to drink whisky or sing Christmas carols.

It almost certainly will be of concern to a future British nationalist government to be on good diplomatic and trading terms with the most populated Muslim country in the world -

With the fall of the Berlin Wall, the collapse of the Soviet Union and as the Red students of 1968 moved into well-paid management positions, they abandoned their theoretical opposition to capitalism and regrouped on the cultural issues now commonly described as 'Political Correctness.'

Indonesia - and with giant oil producers such as Iran and Iraq.

But we don't have to pretend we like their regimes or their religion in order to trade with them to our mutual benefit. Iran and Iraq, after all, have not long since finished a First World War style bloodbath, and each regards the other's dominant version of Islam as a repulsive heresy, but they are still happy to work together, especially when it comes to opposing the Israeli/US dominance of the Middle East. They'll work with us just as happily in the future, even when we're busy shutting down the increasingly empty mosques of our then rapidly whitening inner cities.

Preserving Britain

So to be "anti-Islam" in Britain is not to doom us to perpetual war with one quarter of the world's population. And it certainly is not to be "in the pay of the Jews," as alleged by a thankfully small number of cranks. It is merely a matter of preserving Britain as part of Western civilisation. This is why the British National Party has refused to be stampeded into either the US/UK Establishment pro-Zionist line, or the equally misguided hysterical 'hardline' position whereby we'd ally ourselves with the Devil himself if only he'd fire a few missiles at Jewish settlements in the Gaza Strip. We are not here either to back Bush's campaign to make the world safe for Israel and American oil companies, or to commit political suicide by giving the media the opportunity to crucify us by presenting us as apologists for Muslim terrorism - whether in New York, Tel Aviv or Oldham. We oppose both the Zionist violence and domination which has done so much to fuel the current Islamic rising against the West, and that rising itself, which predates Zionism by 100 years and would exist and present a mortal threat to our civilisation even if the state of Israel had never been created.

Opposing both

Just as genuine nationalists remain opposed to the twin evils of Capitalism and Communism, so a genuine third approach is correct when considering our stance relative to both Bush's 'New World Order' and Islam: A plague on both their houses!

We reject both pro-Zionist internationalism - particularly where it threatens to drag us into other people's wars - and the Islamification of our homelands. Which we oppose more vigorously at any given time should be decided not by dogma, still less by the opportunity to score factional points against other nationalists, but by the simple question: "Which enemy is it in our political interest to be seen to be opposing more vigorously at the moment?" To a party aiming to win seats in London, the West Midlands and the former mill-towns of Northern England, the answer should be pretty obvious.

Nick Griffin

A two-state solution to the Palestinian-Israeli conflict, as supported by the BNP in its analysis of the problems underlying Sept 11th, would be unjust on the Palestinians, but it's hardly a 'sell-out' of the interests of the nations of the West.

ZIMBABWE'S DESCENT INTO VIOLENCE AND DESPAIR

The decision to suspend what used to be called Rhodesia from the "Commonwealth" last month sees little real change by the Western powers who have for the past 20 years sat back while that nation has been propelled into savagery and despair. It took seventy-five years from the arrival of Cecil John Rhodes in the 1880s, when he encountered a largely unpopulated wilderness (save in the areas where the minority but warlike Ndebele tribe were busy slaughtering and enslaving the Shona), to create the vibrant new nation called Rhodesia.

Created from nothing by hard work and a desire to succeed, it became the jewel and breadbasket of Africa; a place of peace, learning and enterprise, where schoolchildren in smart uniforms walked safely to school, where the lilac flowered jacaranda trees lined the clean streets of the thriving towns and cities, and where the farms were the most productive on the continent. It has taken just over 20 years to utterly destroy all that was achieved by White European efforts and to cast that small nation into unbelievable brutality and chaos.

Descent into chaos

Today's "Zimbabwe" is presided over by Robert Mugabe, the black racist dictatorial head of the ZANU-PF which won the corrupt elections in 1980 where intimidation and vote-rigging was widespread. Since being in power the country has become Mugabe's private fiefdom and the classic post-European disaster. In 2002 unemployment stands at 60%, inflation is a run away 75% and over 25% of the Black adult population have AIDS. Hundreds of thousands are starving while tractors lie rusting in weed-choked fields.

Murder and violence

Mugabe has personally ordered the murder of thousands of opponents - African and European alike - cynically seeks to blame the current situation on the handful of Whites who remain. This brutal thug has the ultimate sanction to declare any election result null and void, especially if it does not suit the interests of ZANU-PF. He has total control over the media and recently prevented British reporters from entering the country to cover the March elections. One of Mugabe's repressive tactics is to carry out highly publicised farm invasions by groups of North Korean trained Marxist ZANU-PF activists operating under the guise of bush war 'War Veterans', claiming that the white farmers are holding on to land that should be re-distributed to the black population. This orchestrated race hate campaign totally ignores the fact that more than enough land exists for the government's re-distribution programme. Most of it, however, has been given to friends and supporters of Mugabe and only token portions to the "people".

Liberal hypocrisy

It was not the murder of White farmers, not the rape of their daughters and wives by gangs of the Youth Wing of ZANU-PF, not the wholesale theft of White property nor even a massacre of 20,000 from the Black minority Ndebele people that has caused heightened concern by western governments. It was the accusations made by Commonwealth observers that the March presidential election was rigged that proved too much even for liberal Western leaders and the despotic leaders of other African countries, doubtless seeking to distract attention from their own corrupt and brutal regimes.

The Commonwealth observers specifically highlighted the following crimes:

- Ballot boxes from Opposition areas being reported as "lost"
- Intimidation of Opposition voters by the ZANU-PF youth movement

- Identity cards (needed for voting) of thousands being confiscated by Mugabe's troops
- Deliberate misinformation to the rural population who are perceived to be the Opposition regarding the days of voting.

The Commonwealth's White members, including Canada and New Zealand, at last month's Commonwealth Summit hosted in Australia pressed for action, with support from the leaders of Nigeria and South Africa to bring about Zimbabwe's one-year suspension. This is merely a token gesture of course; being suspended from what is an irrelevant, powerless and effete organisation will do little to trouble Mugabe.

Dictatorial regime

For the foreseeable future, Zimbabwe will remain a decaying one-party state, sinking ever deeper into poverty and ruin, riddled with corruption, cronyism, tribal and racial tensions, all sustained by Mugabe's dictatorial regime.

This nation, rich in natural resources has the potential to be a thriving place once more, and even if the British Government is unwilling to get involved in some kind of renewed neo-colonialism, it does have a clear moral duty to go to the aid of the remaining scores of thousands of terrorised whites. After all, it was the British Establishment which forced them to hand over the country they had built to Mugabe in the first place.

What needs to be done

Instead of using our forces to police Afghanistan, Blair would do better to send our troops to restore order, save lives and restore Rhodesia to its former glory. Mugabe's rag-tag band of uniformed thugs would be no match for our well-trained professionals, and it would all be over within days. The alternative is the continued racist murder of white farmers and mass starvation leading to another wave of African 'refugees' landing up here in Britain.

BLACK COUNTRY ORGANISER JOHN SALVAGE DESCRIBES THE CHALLENGES THAT LIE AHEAD AS THE SPARKS OF COMMUNAL CONFLICT FLY AROUND POWDERKEG BRITAIN

With more and more communities being driven to the end of their collective tethers by the many-faceted madness of the multiracial society, more and more nationalist activists are finding themselves in a position where they have to calm down crowds of angry members of the public. The dilemma is to speak and act with enough passion to restore their faith in the political process, while at the same time defusing their fury and averting a counter-productive riot. We hope that this article, in which the author gives a blow-by-blow account of such a tense meeting, will give readers a glimpse of the challenges that lie ahead as the sparks of communal conflict fly around powderkeg Britain.

On a Sunday afternoon, I had a call from a young man who got our number from an old election address. He told me that his 'local' had a completed form for the anti-Tipton Taliban petition. "There'll be some other people there to hear what you have to say," he told me. I contacted our best local recruiter, Nigel Avery, and we turned up at the pub as agreed, expecting to meet half-a-dozen people. To our surprise, the car park was full.

Massive support

We knew full well that if this was indicative of the feeling in this very tough Black Country community, we would have to put up one hell of a show. Inside, the bar room was packed with men, women and children, who were not used to well dressed people walking in and drinking amongst their own, especially politicians. We'd expected to have a quiet chat with a few men around a table, but now the pub's large back room was filled to bursting point. I addressed the 120 or so assembled, which declined to around 70 within the first twenty minutes, as people went to the bar, and kids ran around the pub.

Extreme anger

Many amongst the 70 or so who remained were almost unmanageable, with questions being shouted out loud, such as what could the BNP do that was any different to "what those other bastards are doing?" At literally dozens of points during my speech, the crowd's anger nearly spilled into a riot. People were extremely angry. Angry at the Muslim takeover of local schools. Angry at the fact that men had been threatened with imprisonment for opposing acts of anti-white violence.

After an hour of speaking with a raised voice and fielding questions from people besides themselves with emotion, my voice began to give out. The landlord had to step in with repeated shouts of "Order, order!" My Number Two could see the problem and the danger: "We're losing them," he shouted into my ear.

Leading from the front

Once the gaffer had got a bit of relative calm, I reminded them about BNP Chairman Nick Griffin's leading-from-the-front campaign on the streets of Oldham - a town with even worse problems than Tipton. The reminder of his appearance on TV while gagged for telling the truth struck a chord and had them cheering. Then I told them that Simon Darby, myself and Nigel also believe in leading from the front. "We've put our heads above the parapet, and we're here to stand up for the people of this town," I told them, to further roars of approval.

At this point I introduced my colleague, Nigel Avery, who grabbed the audience with a fresh attack on Labour's treachery. Again, however, the need to show the crowd that we know how they feel began to conflict with the need to persuade them to be willing to get involved in political work and to wait until May 2nd to have their say. More shouting, with angry, tough men saying that it's too late for any political solution, and that it was time to "go down there and sort 'em out."

We got the message, and redoubled our efforts to stress that a violent backlash would only lead to mass arrests and the further demonisation of the white community. Once again, we won them round. In the end, the Custer's Last Stand atmosphere was actually what made the whole meeting work.

Successful closure

The two-and-a-half hour meeting ended on this massive high note. We were handed donations totalling £90 without even suggesting such a thing.

After most people had left, we were told that if we hadn't said the right things and given people renewed hope in sorting things out democratically, an army of some 150 furious locals (men at another nearby pub were "up for it" as well) had planned to march on the "Tipton Taliban triangle." As it was, the man who had arranged the meeting bear-hugged us and said we'd done the trick.

In confidence, and in a now much quieter atmosphere, with drinks on the house, the BNP was given proof that there is potential for even more support, not just in our key wards, but also further afield.

Another Battle of Britain is now in full swing, and if the good folks of Tipton are any example, with a willingness to listen and to learn, and a determination to win through political action, we will one day see our children once again free to play in streets, in parks and in the countryside, free from the menace of drug pushers, perverts, and anti-white racist thugs with baseball bats.

CANVASSING? NOT SO BAD AFTER ALL, EXPLAINS LONG-STANDING ACTIVIST MARK PAYNE...

After recent electioneering trips over to the Black Country, I thought I'd write regarding what many BNP members feel is a daunting and unnerving task. I refer to canvassing - talking to people on their doorsteps about local issues during election campaigns.

Personally I have never canvassed before, but have spent the last five years door-to-door leafleting for the party on a very regular basis. During that time, naturally, I've spoken to a few people who've come out of their houses to talk about leaflets we had just posted, but that's nothing like deliberately knocking on a door. Would those who answered be friendly, bored or hostile? The truth is, I didn't know what to expect. So Saturday 9th March saw my very first ever attempt at canvassing. I paired myself off with the experienced local candidate John Salvage and, armed with a wealth of local knowledge, we drove to a predominantly white Tipton council estate. The weather was atrocious, and many residents were still in their beds.

Large scale support

Never a person to be stuck for words, I began backing John up with national statistics that were relevant to local issues. After we'd canvassed a dozen or so houses, it became evident that we were getting some very encouraging results. People were telling us they'd already voted for John in the 2001 general election and would do so again. We had people telling us that they were locals in the nearby pub that had seen John to speak to 120 of them one evening and who had not only signed the petition to oust a local Muslim Labour councillor related to the "Tipton Taliban", but had also taken 400 *Freedom*s and posted them through doors in the neighbouring streets. Some people weren't even aware they had voted for a Muslim in voting Labour. Their attitude towards the Labour party changed immediately. Most residents were unaware of Sandwell Council's policy of setting aside 60% of local housing for asylum seekers.

Getting active

We were winning the residents over easily just by knowing what the opposition were doing, and planning to do. In the area I canvassed, there was a ratio of about three 'yes' pledges to every one 'no.'

If those results are mirrored in the final election result, John will be an elected councillor come May 3rd - especially if he gets enough canvassers out to knock and re-knock where residents are out until a large majority of them have had friendly, face-to-face contact with BNP campaigners.

In conclusion, the call for everyone to become active should go without saying - even leafleting is much better than nothing. But now I've actually done both, I have no doubt that canvassing is much, much more effective when it comes to breaking down barriers, winning people over and establishing our credibility at local level.

So I've written this to encourage those people who feel daunted about canvassing to give it a go. Go out with an experienced canvasser who has a good knowledge of the area and its issues. After learning the ropes, try it on your own, using the local knowledge you've acquired from simply listening. It really isn't that daunting. Proof of which, could be seen by yours truly canvassing alone later, after just two hours' canvassing experience.

Not a daunting task

Needless to say, I will be going back for more. Every weekend in April will see us in Tipton and other wards in Sandwell Borough canvassing. In addition, John needs help distributing 10,000 copies of Freedom through doors. We hope to see some more willing leafleters and canvassers there in the run up to the May 2nd election and in every election thereafter. It really isn't that hard. If I can do it - and enjoy it - anyone can!

An appeal from British National Party Chairman Nick Griffin

Dear Elector,

Because the British National Party is still a young, rapidly growing organisation, we're only contesting a minority of seats in this election. As you know, yours is one of them. To the older main parties, winning a couple of extra council seats really makes very little difference. Even if the result in one ward leads to a change in which party controls an entire council, it's still a question of "so what?" As you've already learned from bitter experience, they're all just as corrupt and self-serving as each other anyway.

But voting British National Party, and helping us to win a council seat in your area, you're making a real difference for the better. People like you voting British National Party lead to real benefits at local level in your community.

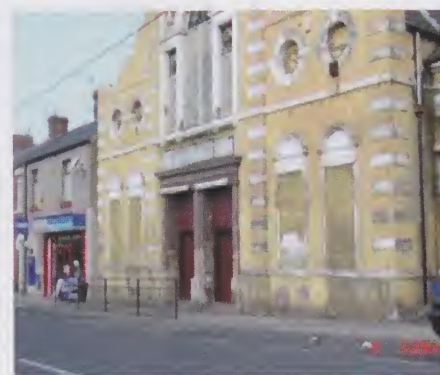

And the benefits won nationally by people like you voting a British National Party councillor into office locally are even greater. All over Britain, literally millions of people are just as fed up as you are with the corruption, failure and anti-British attitudes of the old main parties. All those millions of people are just waiting for a sign that there is a real, credible, alternative; a new main party which is ready and able to stand up for traditional British values and a fair deal for the overtaxed, put-upon majority. If Labour, the Lib-Dems or the Tories win an extra council seat, nothing will change. But if your vote helps the BNP to win in your ward, the left-ist media will go berserk and millions of decent people who have almost given up hope will see that the British are at last waking up.

Getting a local British National Party councillor elected won't change your life, although it certainly will help to get you a better service from your local council. But the election of British National Party councillors will shake up the entire British political system, help the British National Party grow even faster, and speed the day when the long-suffering British people finally take back control of their own country!

National Chairman
Nick Griffin

THIS IS WHAT YOU GET FOR VOTING LABOUR

All over Britain, estates run by corrupt and lazy Labour and Lib-Dem councils are steadily collapsing into Third world levels of squalor, decay and crime. It happens by degrees, starting with little things that fat, self-satisfied councillors don't think matter. Abandoned cars are left to be smashed up by bored local kids. Junkies and anti-social estate-wreckers are housed among ordinary decent communities, and left like rotten apples to turn everything around them rotten. One-by-one, houses are abandoned and boarded up, but are still vandalised. Clear signs of hard drug use - including needles and tin-foil are ignored by the police. Decent people who can find a way to move get out of the area. More houses fall empty. With no police presence, youngsters run riot and the vandalism gets even worse, even including arson. Whole streets of structurally sound houses, which were well cared for and cherished just a few years earlier end up derelict, then the bulldozers move in and yet another community dies. Here Identity publishes a selection of photos taken by local party officials in Sunderland, which expose some of the rewards that are wrought from voting Labour, Tory or Liberal Democrat. Labour council candidates still want our votes, but the only time they even give a thought to the British working class is when they vote British National Party.

EUROPEAN AMERICA: OLDER THAN WE THINK?

Unknown to most, researchers have been overturning one of the best-known 'facts' of ancient history. Until very recently, almost everyone was agreed that the Americas were first settled by Asians who crossed over by the Bering Straits 10,000 years ago. Now it seems increasingly likely that North America was first populated by ancient European tribes.

Characteristic ancient Celtic monuments - such as standing stones and subterranean chambers - are scattered all over the Eastern half of the present-day USA, in such states as Oklahoma, Vermont and New Hampshire. At Mystery Hill in New Hampshire, many stones have been recovered from a large stone built settlement that are even inscribed in Ogham, the ancient Celtic alphabet. These carvings are supposed to date from 800BC-200AD.

Mixed out of existence

Probably these early European inhabitants of America ceased to exist when they mixed with more numerous Amerindian populations, leaving no traces except for a lingering genetic inheritance seen in some blue and grey-eyed Indians. The Sioux war leader Crazy Horse, for instance, was described by contemporary witnesses as being fair-skinned and light haired.

But until very recently there was no definite proof of early European settlement sufficient to convince the scientific establishment. This began to change in 1996 when two walkers found a skeleton by the Columbia River in Washington State. The physical features were European, and the bones were thought to be those of a murder victim, until the skeleton - dubbed "Kennewick Man" - was found to be over 9,000 years old.

New evidence

But the very latest evidence for ancient European settlement of America comes from a dig in Kenosha County, situated in south eastern Wisconsin. Excavations there found woolly mammoth bones which had belonged to animals butchered by men with tools about 16,000 years ago. This is long before the first Americans are supposed to have crossed the land bridge from Asia to Alaska. At this time all of what is now Canada, together with the northern U.S., was covered by the glaciation of the Ice Age.

A few scientists still claim that settlers from Asia could have made the trek at that date through an ice free corridor to the west of the Rockies that was only sealed at the height of glaciation.

Caucasian settlers

But Dennis Stanford, curator of archaeology at the Smithsonian Institution's National Museum of Natural History, and Bruce Bradley, a research associate of the Carnegie Museum say that the site is the result of the activities of early Caucasian settlers who it is believed made the journey from Europe to America at the height of the Ice Age, possibly as long back as 18,000 years ago.

According Stanford and Bradley, sea levels during the Ice Ages were as much as 400 feet lower than today. The prevailing conditions mean that prehistoric Europeans would only have needed to make a 1,500 mile journey along the edge of sheltered ice sheets with abundant seals, walrus and fish for food. These pioneers would probably have used highly stable animal-skin boats similar to the coracles still used in Ireland and Wales.

Accepted fact

The abundant food to be found on the way was probably part of the motivation for the journey, with many European hunting grounds being cut off by glaciation. The two archaeological researchers also suggest that there are close similarities between the bifaced stone spear points found in the U.S. and the Solutrean culture along the north coast of Spain and dating to between 16,500 and 22,000 years ago. It's worth remembering that around 40 years ago there was intense resistance to the idea that the Vikings travelled to America. The Norse voyages to America are now accepted fact.

The attempted hush-up that surrounded the uncovering of Kennewick man contrasts dramatically with the open-minded and helpful way the Chinese reacted to the find of the Caucasian mummies in Xinjiang. Truth will eventually out, however, in spite of all the twistings and tricks of the politically correct.

AMAZING NEW FIND FROM BRONZE AGE GERMANY

Along with the overturning of dogma about the early inhabitants of America, archaeologists are having to come to terms with the implications of a find of Bronze Age treasures in the wooded Kyffhäuser mountains of Saxony in Germany.

The theory used to be that European knowledge of metal-working came radiating outwards from Crete and Egypt. But more and more evidence now suggests that metallurgy was an independent European discovery.

The new German find was made by two treasure hunters. Though the haul included two swords, bronze amulets and spear heads, by far the most important item found was large circular gold disc.

The disc, measuring 38 centimetres wide and weighing 2kg, is covered with depictions of the sun, moon and stars. It seems that ancient Europeans had knowledge and interest in of the solar system at an amazingly distant date - 3,600 years ago. Such astronomical discs have been found in Egypt before, but never in Europe.

The intriguing gold disc is now kept by the archaeology department of the City of Halle after being recovered from its original discoverers, who tried to sell the unique find for a stereo system and 'a few beers'. Scientists are describing the find as "one of the most significant ever."

THE TOXIC CULTURE OF RAMPANT GREED

Any civilisation that poisons its children before they are even born is inherently criminal. As regular ID writer Lee Barnes explains, this is exactly what is happening in Britain...

As we enter the twenty first century the traditional ethical and moral values of Western civilization have been utterly subverted by greed and ideological fanaticism.

The physical triumph of global capitalism over nation states, and the temporary intellectual victory of neo-Marxist liberalism and secular humanism over more traditional and natural ways of living, have undermined the very foundations of life, health and freedom.

The ones to blame

The cause of (and therefore the ones to blame for) this catastrophe are the 'progressive socialists' of the liberal-left and the reactionary pseudo-patriots of the Thatcherite right, with their rejection of the concept of 'society' and deification of individualism and short-term financial profit.

The liberal-left and reactionary right have united to proclaim and promote technological progress, whilst being criminally complacent about monitoring it. Only a nationalist party, that understanding the sacred nexus between a people and the land in which they live, can offer an alternative to the toxic culture of modernity. Only a party that understands the importance of the Natural Order can offer an alternative to the New World Order.

In 1999 Friends of the Earth announced that, after tests on babies still in the womb, scientists had discovered over 350 different man made chemicals present in the blood of the developing children. Most of these were chemical compounds used mainly in industry. Others were chemicals used in medicines, food production and agriculture.

Chemical cocktails

Of the 350 found, only a tiny minority of these chemicals had ever been tested before being licensed for use and most had never been tested at all. Tests for the effects of combined cocktails of these chemicals present at the same time in the human body, have never been done for any of them.

Every baby born in Britain at the present time is bombarded with artificial industrial and agricultural chemicals from the moment they are conceived. Many of these chemicals are either totally untested - even though often specifically designed to kill living organisms - or are already known to be cancer causing. Most of them are toxic in some way. Yet we are told to accept government reassurances that such chemicals are safe and that we should not worry for our children's health.

In 2001 doctors in cities around Britain noticed that childhood cancer rates had risen by 30 % over the last few years. Combined with the increasing rate of cancer in adults the rise in numbers could not in itself be explained unless some other factor not present before was taken into account.

Meantime more and more research had been coming out from around the world noting the powerful toxic effects of industrial chemicals that had hitherto been accepted as safe.

Alarming evidence

Even more alarming is evidence of the devastating effects of combinations of chemicals on human and animal biology. Yet industry and the government are still refusing to act. Instead of adopting the precautionary principle when it comes to guaranteeing public health, government and industry still embrace the Profit Motive. The numbers of newly designed manmade chemicals used by industry are increasing yearly.

The primary victims of this crime of duplicity and complacency are the voiceless unborn. We have built for our children a carcinogenic civilization that wantonly exposes them to the risk of sickness, disease and death before they are even born. Those that conspired to create this Toxic Culture are the real criminals of today. Once in power we will ensure that those that profited from such criminal acts will face the full wrath of the law.

Protecting the unborn

The British National Party is the only political party determined to protect the rights of the unborn.

New Labour and the Conservatives both embrace a materialistic ideology that believes that the Laws of Nature can be broken with impunity. The price of such hubris is unfortunately mostly borne by the poorest and the most vulnerable whilst the rewards, as are always reaped by the rich. Under us, such arrogance will no longer go unpunished. ■

"As we enter the twenty first century the traditional ethical and moral values of Western civilisation have been utterly subverted by greed and ideological fanaticism."

YOUNG BNP GOING FROM STRENGTH TO STRENGTH

For years the British National Party (and the nationalist movement as a whole) has lacked a decent youth wing, but thanks largely to the hard work of one man, this is no longer the case! Since Mark Collett became YBNP leader in Summer 2001 the Young British National Party has been transformed from being a insignificant BNP 'circle', principally due to a lack of someone with the time to run it, to being a vibrant youth movement. The YBNP is recruiting new people every single day, and it now has members and supporters in all corners of Great Britain.

The nationwide five-a-side football tournament held in Leeds which attracted around 50 participants, most of them teenagers.

As well as supporting the BNP by attending national and local BNP events and helping out with serious political work on a local basis, the YBNP also holds events solely for YBNP members.

First stirrings

The first such event to be held was Camp Excalibur, which was a real test-case for the YBNP due to it being the YBNP's first independent event, coupled with the intense publicity in the run-up to the event, but it was a test that the YBNP stood up to marvelously. The camp, which involved such activities as canoeing, paintballing and rock-climbing, was a total success, and Camp Excalibur will certainly be a regular feature of the YBNP calender.

Since Camp Excalibur the YBNP has grown at a healthy rate. YBNP activists from around Britain have been out recruiting youngsters to the ranks of the YBNP by leafletting outside schools and getting out onto the streets to speak directly to young people.

The response the YBNP receives from schoolkids is overwhelmingly positive, as the Young BNP is the only political organisation which bothers to cater for Britain's youth. But school pupils are not the YBNP's only recruits.

Student section

Since the British Students Association became the official student wing of the YBNP a good number of students have been recruited to its ranks too. The BSA actively promotes the BNP within Britain's university campuses, and it now has members involved in various student societies, student unions, and even within the NUS (National Union of Students).

Cyber presence

The YBNP's website (www.youngbnp.com) is one of the best on the net and receives a huge amount of visitors. As well as articles, policy statements, news, and pictures of YBNP events, the website also includes a map of Britain, on which is labelled all the schools, colleges and universities where the YBNP has members and supporters. The YBNP encourages all our members and supporters to get in touch and let the YBNP know where they study - no doubt their headmasters will be proud when they see their school on the Young British National Party map of Britain! The YBNP keeps in touch with its members and supporters through regular email bulletins (to subscribe send an email to ybnpbulletin@lycos.co.uk) and the BSA also has its own monthly bulletins which can be subscribed to by emailing britishstudents@yahoo.co.uk. Very soon the YBNP will have its own information booklets to be sent out to enquirers, and is also in the process of getting assorted items of YBNP merchandise produced, some of which will only be available for purchase by YBNP members.

If you are patriotic, under the age of 25, and sick of the way in which this country is being run, then the only place for you is in the YBNP! Get involved now, it's the best decision you'll ever make!

Contact the Young British National Party at: YBNP, PO Box BR10, Bramley, Leeds LS13 or telephone 07968 179735.

ARGENTINA TODAY, BRITAIN TOMORROW?

In the past few months, Argentina's economy has taken a steep nosedive. Politicians have plundered the country for years, corruption is endemic and so many utilities have been privatised that there's little left to sell-off to buy a bit more time. Doctors and teachers have been turned into door-to-door hawkers by the economic downturn, and the same trend can be seen in Britain.

Riots and looting on the streets of Buenos Aires have sparked jitters among economic pundits around the world.

After a string of long-extended power cuts from California to Auckland, one wonders why there are still any takers left for the Friedmanite-Thatcherite dogmas now given the fancy new title of 'globalisation'. Argentina is a basket case, but not a special case; there are other once prosperous nations on the same road.

Sixty year decline

Is the situation really very much different here in Britain? Argentina has declined in 60 years from the seventh richest country in the world to an economic basket case - a truly British fate. Beyond all the trash provided by the sloppy cynics of the BBC and ITV news department - Beckham's shaven eyebrows or a search for 'Harry Potter' look-alikes - certain facts remain constant and more or less unreported.

In Britain today, society is roughly divided between a fortunate 30% and a much less fortunate 70%. That's just a rough average of course - the ratio would probably be 45-55 in somewhere like Guildford, and 15-85 in Middlesbrough. But the general trend is clear enough. What an awesome indictment it is when such a 'Labour' government - in reality nothing more than a repellent puppet of big money - presides over a steady increase in child poverty!

Now, the top 30% may seem to be prosperous, but in most cases it is a bogus prosperity based largely on credit. The remainder the majority of the population have to put up with increasing poverty and insecurity.

Managed decline

The politicians who preside over this fine mess give out interesting verbal and visual signals: they usually appear dazed, unsure and confused. Not like the leaders of former time, but more like simulacra of prattling old women, who gently ease Great Britain further along the road of 'managed decline.' Well, gentlemen, I wonder how just much longer you will be able to manage to hold everything together! With them exposed as liars and cheats who self-admittedly fake the hospital waiting lists, we are entitled to ask what else remains faked but unadmitted? Surely those pesky unemployment figures, which have acquired an amusing life of their own? One day we hear that an aerospace firm has closed, bringing cataclysmic job losses to the Isle of Wight. A week passes and Gordon Brown, his mouth moving like a goldfish, informs us all about our prosperity and economic success.

Disillusionment

Increasingly, governments have become 'de-legitimised' by falling voter participation due to disillusionment. Politicians have been bought up and corrupted by vested interests.

A spiritual sickness eats away at the foundations of our formerly secure civilisation.

Under these circumstances, is it any wonder that the Argentinians have taken to the streets in an explosion of wrath against the corrupt nonentities of the System?

The British are, maybe, a 'buttoned-up' and stolid people. But when things really begin to change, I do suspect that it will make Argentina will look like a tea-party. Even without the positive example of the BNP, the old parties would still be doomed by multiple problems, completely insoluble in their own world-view.

Job losses everywhere

In just a few days last month we saw another 6,000 jobs go at British Airways, in addition to the earlier round of 7,000 redundancies. Famous British technology success story Dyson is relocating to the Far East for its cheaper labour. Even the "Royal Albert" China of the Stoke Doulton firm will now be made in Indonesia, a move which has cost 1,000 jobs.

Even the alleged future of cheap female labour in call-centres now seems to be clouded, with BT warning of thousands of losses in that sector, and more and more calls to British households coming from the Far East.

Sleaze and the export of jobs have become intimately linked. Indian steel mogul Lakshmi Mittal, a New Labour donor, was helped by phony Tony to take over a steel works in Rumania, probably just as a first act before being allowed to asset strip Corus (once British Steel). Of course, Tony can plead 'necessity' - he has a yawning £10 million deficit in 'Labour' finances to fill!

New Labour and the Conservatives see nothing wrong with globalisation and the export of jobs. More of the same is planned. It's the 'coolie-isation' of the British workforce. If you object to this dismal fate, then your place is with us!

IMMIGRANTS: HOW MUCH DO THEY COST THE BRITISH TAXPAYER?

Apart from the painful spectacle of seeing our beloved homeland being reduced to a dumping ground for Third World immigrants, most of us have no idea how much extra taxes we are paying towards the benefits and state services they consume.

A new Home Office report (The migrant population in the UK: fiscal effects February 2002) makes the incredible claim that the total tax and national insurance revenue received from immigrants for 1999/2000 (£31.2 billion) exceeded their cost to the state (£28.8 billion) by £2.4 billion, equivalent to around 1p on the basic rate of tax! However, this blatant attempt to portray immigrants as a blessing instead of a curse does not stand up to close inspection.

Skewing the figures

The survey does not include illegal immigrants nor second or subsequent generations with their vastly disproportionate unemployment rates, just "foreign born" people, a few of them being of European origin eg White American or Australian shipping magnates or very highly paid financial services and City of London employees who are seen as assets to the UK. Independent sources (accountants Ernst and Young) show that for the year 1999/2000 the top 1% of income tax payers paid 20% of all income tax and the top 10% paid 50% of all income tax. Assuming a similar proportion for all taxes, the contribution from the top 10% of foreign-born immigrants to the £31.2 billion would be £15.6 billion leaving the remaining £15.6 billion to be paid by the rest.

Loss of billions

Similarly, the consumption by this remaining 90% would be £28.9 billion, less 10%, or £25.92 billion, a net LOSS to the state of £10.3 billion or around £370 for each native British tax payer! In other words, a totally different picture emerges as the 90% are seen to obliterate the contribution of valuable, foreign-born "immigrants" (or more correctly, "guest workers").

If second and subsequent generations and illegal immigrants could be taken into consideration the result would be even more damaging to the government's disastrous record on immigration and asylum policy.

Government negligence

This Home Office report says it is one of only a very few pieces of research carried out into the economic effects of immigration over the last 40 or 50 years. This is a further indictment of successive governments' negligence in this crucial issue. Nowhere in the report are social costs mentioned nor the costs of the army of race advisers, translators, social workers, or for policing the crime wave caused by immigrants in London and other large cities - nor the trauma and upset of the whole issue on our own people.

THE RELIEF OF LUCKNOW AND THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE BRITISH AS THE RULERS OF INDIA

Britain, through the instrument of the Honourable East India Company had, by the mid 19th century, control of the Indian subcontinent from the borders of Afghanistan in the west to the jungles of Burma in the east and from the Himalayas to the beaches of southern Ceylon. Relations with the native Indians were largely cordial. Many of the higher castes of Hindus were recruited into the Company Army and in 1857 the total number of soldiers in India was 34,000 Europeans of all ranks and 257,000 'Sepoys'.

However mistrust of the British by the Indians grew, largely through religious suspicions about British regulations.

The scene was set for a tragic series of events, beginning with the introduction of the Enfield rifle which required a paper cartridge that contained both ball and powder charge. The end of this cartridge had to be bitten off and the cartridge then rammed down the muzzle of the weapon. Sepoys quickly spread the rumour that grease on the cartridge to ease ramming into the weapon was a mixture of cow (sacred to Hindus) and pig (abhorrent to Moslems) fat. Biting such a cartridge would defile both Hindus and Moslems.

Start of the mutiny

It was later declared that there was no animal fat in the grease, but in the atmosphere of distrust that prevailed in 1857 the damage had been done.

In May 1857 Indian troopers of the 3rd Light Cavalry in Meerut refused orders to handle the new cartridges. They were arrested, court-martialled and sentenced to 10 years hard labour each. The following day as the Britons prepared for Sunday church, Meerut exploded. An angry mob broke open the town jail and released their comrades, then they poured into the compound where the Europeans lived and murdered any Europeans they could find. Whole families, men, women, children and servants, were slaughtered. The compound was put to the torch and the attackers fled. The Indian Mutiny had started!

Word swept through the province of Oudh where these events were taking place. Henry Lawrence, the governor of Lucknow, a town 280 miles away, was aware of the precarious position of the Europeans in his town and decided to make his stand inside the Residency compound. He gathered the entire European community of Lucknow and a garrison of about 1,700 men into the 33-acre compound. Half the defending force were sepoy who had remained loyal. Inside the compound there were nine separate buildings and a high mud-wall strengthened by earthworks formed the perimeter. Trenches and gunpits had been dug, wire-entanglements laid out and booby traps set. When the mutiny broke out in Lucknow toward the end of June, the mutineers tried storming the walls but were always beaten back.

Dire situation

There was a constant barrage of artillery and musket fire from the mutineers.

One of the first shells killed Lawrence when it crashed into the billiard room in which he was staying. His death was a great blow to morale. In addition to the sniping, the shelling and the direct assaults on the perimeter - the mutineers began tunnelling to try and undermine the walls.

The British were forced to counter-mine and some of the fiercest battles of the siege were fought deep in the hot humid earth with pistols, shovels, knives and fists.

Food started to run short, the casualties mounted steadily, rats swarmed everywhere and the July sun was intense, day time temperatures soared to 33 Celsius. In the middle of August, a message reached Lucknow that a relief force was on its way. The garrison had been decimated to 350 British soldiers and 300 loyal sepoy, with over 550 women, children, sick and wounded. Days became weeks and still no-one came. The Union Flag defiantly remained attached to its pole high over the compound day and night.

Courageous Highlanders

On September 25th, a ragged but defiant band of British troops - Highlanders - burst into the Residency with bagpipes playing. Under the joint command of Sir Henry Havelock and Sir James Outram they had fought a gruelling campaign up from Cawnpore. Unfortunately, there were only a thousand of them and no sooner had the Residency gates closed behind them than the siege continued. The extra mouths to feed placed an intolerable burden on the already over-stretched supplies.

Running out of supplies

The bombardments and the mining continued and everything started to run out. Doctors had no more medicines to give the sick and wounded.

Rations became smaller every day and it seemed as if Havelock and Outram's gallant march might have been in vain. Communication was difficult until Martin Gubbins, Financial Commissioner in the Residency, discovered particulars of Popham's Semaphore in a battered encyclopaedia.

A make shift semaphore was made and erected on the roof of the Residency building which allowed communication with the Commander at the Alambagh, a building some four miles south of the city.

To the rescue!

By this means word came through in October to the besieged that another force was on its way led by Sir Colin Campbell, a Crimean War veteran. When word was obtained that the force was a few miles outside the city a 36-year-old Irish civil servant, Henry Kavanagh, volunteered to slip out of the Residency, make contact with the relief column and guide it back through the city. Kavanagh had gained a reputation for courage in the underground battles of the mines and countermines and his offer was eagerly accepted. Disguised as an Indian, Kavanagh dodged past sepoy checkpoints, swam the River Gomti and found a British sentry.

Eight days later he returned and led Havelock and Outram through the streets to a meeting with their rescuer. Kavanagh was one of only a handful of civilians ever to be awarded the Victoria Cross.

No attempt was made to enter the Residency by the small but victorious relief force. Instead it pacified the city long enough for the inhabitants of the compound to be withdrawn. On November 18th, the withdrawal began with, the women and children leaving first.

Rulers of India!

The city was not completely pacified and much of the withdrawal was made under a heavy barrage of fire. Finally the rear-guard slipped out and the Residency and city of Lucknow were given up to the mutineers. The British remembered to take down the Residency flag before they left. The whole force now made its way back to Cawnpore and safety.

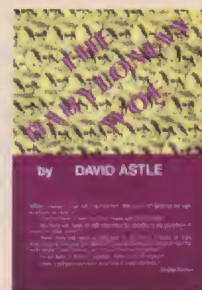

The British victory of the Relief of Lucknow broke the spirit of the mutineers and the city was retaken the following year. It was then only a matter of time before the British re-established themselves as the undisputed rulers of the whole of India.

Sir: Just a note to congratulate you on a first class, professional magazine. I just hope that it can be got onto a really regular production schedule, because it's very good for turning sympathisers into members.

Also, while writing, I'd like to put in a 'good word' for canvassing. I first got involved with British nationalism back in the 1970s but in all those years, until this election, no one had ever told me to canvass - or shown me how to do it. No wonder we didn't win!

The worst thing about this past failure is that it was so unnecessary: Canvassing is easy, in fact, even enjoyable, because it's fantastic to find out how many people agree with us. 'Old hands' like me, who remember the hostility to our ideas in the days when Liverpool was a Militant stronghold, can hardly believe the change.

Whether the party's switch to intensive canvassing has come in time to guarantee winning seats this time around I don't, of course, know. But I'm sure that it's the way ahead, and that winning is now only a matter of time.

Sir: Just when you thought the lib-left couldn't get any dafter or score any more own goals, the Daily Mail of 9th April reports another slap in the face to the British majority.

With schools all over the country planning either to let children watch the historic pageantry of the Queen Mother's funeral on TV, or at least to mark the event with a two minutes' silence, the borogues of Ealing, Brent and Oldham banned any such commemoration.

A spokesman for Brent council said "We have the second highest diversity of population in London and some schools might not find it appropriate. "We have to be sensitive to the fact that child all come from different backgrounds and cultures," was the warped logic at Ealing.

The Lib-Dems in charge of Oldham - faced with a serious electoral challenge from the BNP - were rather more coy than the Labour loonies in West London about their decision to refuse to recognise the event, saying simply that it would be 'impractical' to do so.

But there's no doubt about the real reasons: They didn't want to 'offend' the ethnic minority pupils who dominate a sizeable number of Oldham's schools; they were afraid of tensions between white and Asian pupils in senior schools, and they didn't want to run the risk of Muslim pupils 'disrespecting' any such commemoration, and angering the majority public, in the way that happened in many places after September 11th.

I hope there's time to make use of this in the final wave of election material.

Sir: It's clear that the anti-British far-left are frantic with worry about the big BNP push in the May council elections.

To my mind, a report in the Lancashire Evening Telegraph indicates that their despair at our progress is tempting them to break the law with their undemocratic campaigns. According to the report, Burnley ANL organiser Charlotte Smith has warned "We will probably be talking to people outside polling stations on election day."

Traditionally, 'tellers' from various parties have stood outside polling stations to take the polling numbers of voters, but they are not permitted to try to influence how they vote.

For a gang of extremist thugs and outsiders with a track record of inciting violence and threatening to 'smash' their political opponents to claim the right to approach voters in a way forbidden to democratic parties is an outrage.

It is also likely to be a breach of Section 17.2. of The Representation of the Peoples Act 1983, which forbids 'undue influence,' which it defines as "using force, violence or restraint, or the threat thereof, to induce or compel someone to vote or refrain from voting, or preventing the free exercise of the franchise by abduction, duress or any fraudulent device or contrivance."

Threatening voters, either personally, or with the prospect of riots or massive job losses in their town if they vote BNP, would clearly come under this definition.

The full details can be found at www.elections.dtlr.gov.uk/ge2001/procedures/02.htm and I hope that BNP election agents will point this out to local police officers and ensure that they take whatever steps are necessary to uphold the law.

I read Nick Griffin's "The BNP's Foreign Policy", Identity, March 2002. It was significant that the BNP Chairman considered the Australian question from the position that white-Australia could neither be defined as "British" by ethnicity nor by national identity.

This is indeed the reality now in so far as it ever really was the case. It is the present situation that Australia's true cultural identity may be defined in the phrase 'European generally, native-Australian in particular'. Your writer has grasped the fact that colonies may become nations.

From the current Australian nationalist viewpoint, too, there is that certain interest which lies in the likelihood that European nations of the Southern Hemisphere may experience Third World population-transfer-invasion.

This may be a new dynamic worthy of consideration. I believe the article has moved the foreign policy perspective of British nationalism beyond the 'out of Europe' position of the recent past, no less than it has overcome the lingering imperialism of the NF document 'Britain World Power Or Pauper State' of the 1970's.

I recall the latter item conceived of Australia as a resources quarry and breadbasket for a revived Empire. Other than Australian reactionaries, whom the average BNP member would see as hopeless Tories, it failed to move the local nationalists. The foreign-policy positions taken by the BNP deserve not only the support of its members but consideration by those yet to commit. Congratulations and many thanks.

LAUNCH OF CULTURAL WEBSITES

More and more rank-and-file supporters of the Scottish and Welsh nationalist parties are beginning to wake up to the way their nations are being sold out by SNP and Plaid Cymru leaders, which makes it an ideal time for the BNP to step up its moves to win over such people. As part of this drive, the party therefore launched a dedicated Scottish website on St. Andrew's Day, and a bi-lingual Welsh website on Saint David's Day. Both sites have gained much publicity. Nor have Ireland or Ulster been neglected, with their own BNP sites being launched on St. Patrick's Day. An English website will be launched on St. George's Day, April 23rd. With a sense of Englishness growing at an astounding rate - especially among the young - the BNP is determined to harness and help to shape this tide of white ethnic/cultural awareness, rather than leaving it to be exploited by those who would use it to break up Britain. We want to use Britain's homegrown diversity as a source of pride and strength.

PUBLICITY MATERIAL FOR BRANCHES NOT INVOLVED IN ELECTIONS

ASYLUM SEEKERS? TIME TO PUT OUR OWN PEOPLE FIRST!

Every year, hundreds of thousands of so-called 'refugees' come to Britain and are overwhelmingly given free housing and full benefits. Just for being born in a different country, they are given everything that British people have to work for. This is a time when our schools are full of them, our hospitals are full of them, and our roads are full of them. They are taking our jobs, our money, and our resources. They are taking our future. It is time to put our own people first. It is time to stop giving them everything and start giving them what they deserve. It is time to stop giving them everything and start giving them what they deserve. It is time to stop giving them everything and start giving them what they deserve.

CRIME IS OUT OF CONTROL!

Crime in Britain is out of control! Every time we switch on our TV or pick up a newspaper, we hear another report about murders, rapes, burglaries, car thefts and more. Britain used to be a peaceful country, where crime was rare, where children could walk the streets at night, where the fear of mugging, rape or worse, people could leave their doors unlocked without fear of burglary. Whatever happened?

IMMIGRATION?

OPEN YOUR EYES!

According to the British Home Office, the number of immigrants entering the country has risen by 50% in the last 10 years. This is a massive increase, and it is causing serious problems for our country. Immigrants are taking our jobs, our money, and our resources. They are taking our future. It is time to stop giving them everything and start giving them what they deserve. It is time to stop giving them everything and start giving them what they deserve. It is time to stop giving them everything and start giving them what they deserve.

HAPPY BIRTHDAY BNP!

On the 7th April, the BNP celebrated its 20th birthday. On the 7th April, 1982, the BNP was formed at a conference in Central London out of an amalgamation of smaller nationalist groups.

A ROUND-UP OF THE MONTH'S PARTY NEWS

■ In mid-March around 50 BNP members and supporters attended the first major meeting held in Bristol several years. The first half of the meeting, chaired by Wiltshire organiser Robert Baggs, allowed several new faces in the organisation to introduce themselves and give short speeches. First to take the floor was Bristol organiser Clive Courtney who explained how important it was to become active and take our message to our people. Next, Michaela Mackenzie, responsible for local group liaison, explained the importance of appealing to the hearts and minds of our people. There were also talks from Mike Howson, Gloucestershire organiser Jo Wallace and Terry Scott, who explained he joined the party as there was no alternative for those who really cared about the future of this country. The final speaker in the first half of the meeting was Devon organiser, Tony North who gave an update on the activities in Devon and mentioned how important it was to maintain contact with those people, who enquired about the party, until they joined. After a short break Clive Wakley told the meeting about the region's campaign against a proposed asylum centre in Pershore, Gloucestershire. Regional organiser Bruce Cowd, explained that activists within the region would be visiting Tipton in the West Midlands to help with the party's local election campaign. Finally party Chairman Nick Griffin gave an excellent speech, in which he gave examples of anti-white racism not reported in the general media, he related his experiences of visits to some of the areas worse affected by unsuccessful multiculturalism. The collection during the break, including literature sales raised a total of £355. There is no denying the South West is well and truly back in action!

■ A number of recent meetings have provided the best possible evidence of the current surge in support for the BNP up and down the country. Around 80 members and new supporters gave the Black Country branch a record attendance of local people. Addressed by John Salvage, Simon Darby, Nigel Avery and Nick

Griffin, the meeting saw the local collection record broken for the second month running. More than 120 people turned up to hear local activists, YBNP leader Mark Collett and party chairman Nick Griffin speak on the need to build a powerful voice for white people in Bradford. More than 40 Sussex activists and supporters made the second meeting of Worthing BNP a record attendance. This was addressed by Worthing organiser Darren Copeland, and Nick Griffin, prior to his flying to the United States the following morning for a weekend of meetings. Mr Griffin also spoke at an enthusiastic meetings designed to encourage local activists to put in maximum effort in the forthcoming elections in Bexleyheath, Burnley and Oldham. The Burnley meeting attracted a record 150 people, and was chaired by regional organiser Chris Jackson and also addressed by Martin Wingfield, who gave an account of the campaign so far, and of the plans for the last few weeks before polling day. The £600 required for this was raised in little more than a minute. In a hectic few weeks, Nick Griffin also spoke at several meetings in less well-established areas, visiting Doncaster and two entirely new groups, on the Wirral and in Wakefield. The Merseyside meeting was chaired by regional organiser Joe Owens, and the meeting of the new group in the promising part of South Yorkshire was chaired by local secretary Graham Hardy, who recently joined the BNP after leaving the rump of the National Democrats.

■ While activists in many BNP heartland areas were busy with the election campaign, a number of other areas saw further efforts last month to capitalise on public opposition to Labour's proposed rash of Asylum Centres. Merseyside BNP gained more front page publicity and popular support by opposing centres planned in Skelmersdale, Ellesmere Port and the terribly neglected Liverpool suburb of Garston. Meanwhile activists from Beds & Bucks BNP spearheaded a drive to get the party established in Oxfordshire by opposing the asylum centre which is likely to be forced on residents near Bicester. West Country members sacrificed several weekends to do the same around Pershore, on the north eastern edge of their region.
